 Dear Dr Keating

I am in the process of producing a poster displaying the history and development of the Sydney College of Chiropractic (SCC). I serve on the SCC Council, which offers advice on the current chiropractic course being run at Macquarie University, Sydney. It is at the request of the Centre for Chiropractic Director, Dr Ray Hayek, that the council has initiated the production of a series of history posters.

Historically, the Sydney College was established in 1959 under the direction of Dr Alfred Kaufmann. In 1963 Dr Wallace Brown undertook the direction of the college.

Our records show that both the abovenamed principals received Diplomas conferring a Degree of Doctor of Chiropractic by way of thesis from the Indiana Chiropractic College: Kaufmann in 1962 and Brown in 1963 (see attached documents). You may note the change of title of the college in Indianapolis, Indiana, although the signatories remain the same. The third attachment is a certificate from the Lincoln College of Naturopathic Physicians and Surgeons, which states that A. Kaufmann is a member of the faculty.

I have read some of your essays on chiropractic history and find no mention of the above institutions. In acknowledging your expertise as a chiropractic historian I respectfully seek your help to clarify the following matters.

Can you direct or advise me on the fate of the above mentioned colleges? I would like to establish, for the record, the origin of these colleges and their eventual progress throughout the years. Was the Indiana Chiropractic College run in competition with Lincoln College of Chiropractic or was it absorbed into Lincoln? Was the Lincoln College of Naturopathic Physicians and Surgeons related to the Lincoln College of Chiropractic? Is it possible to ascertain where the records of the above colleges are currently held?

Your assistance would be greatly appreciated and I look forward to your response.

Yours faithfully,
 John Cice DC DO
